Visit Southland Toyota of Orange on your off day from work and get an instant memory! The 2013 Chevrolet Silverado is Chevrolet's first all-new pickup truck in four years, a direct challenge to long-selling Ford F-Series and Ram pickups, which have dominated the American pickup market for the better part of two decades. The St. Paul-based General Motors division says the 2013 Silverado gives it a new edge in a market where consumers can buy a Ford F-150 with a V-8, or Ram with a diesel, or a variety of other pickups. Chevrolet offers four engine choices for the Silverado: a 3.6-liter V-6, a 4.3-liter V-6, a 6.0-liter V-8 and a 5.3-liter V-8. Like all Silverados, the 2013 model is rated at 17 mpg city and 25 highway. The V-6 and V-8 have four- and six-speed automatic transmissions. The base Silverado has a six-speed manual transmission, and high-end models come with a seven-speed automatic that is available with the base model. The 2013 Silverado Silverado is available in both two- and four-wheel-drive configurations. The 2013 Chevy Silverado comes standard with three electronic devices: the OnStar communications system, a backup camera and an integrated backup warning chime. The 2013 Chevrolet Silverado does not have available technology that allows the truck's computer to communicate with OnStar's roadside assistance through the OnStar navigation system. Chevrolet says the 2013 Silverado is smarter about how it drives and maneuvers, and that it is more capable and safe. The automaker says it redesigned the interior of the 2013 Silverado for a better driver experience. "It's not just a truck. It's a full-size pickup truck that has class," says Michael Simoes, director of marketing for Chevrolet truck. "It still is a work truck, it's still a heavy-duty truck but when people see it coming down the highway, they're impressed." General Motors has sold more than 18 million Silverados since the model's introduction in 1975. The 2013 Chevy Silverado has a greater payload capacity and more cargo-carrying volume than previous generations. The Silverado gets a longer wheelbase, a

Q: When exactly is autowired stopped working? I have @Controller methods in my controller that can use a service bean injected using @Autowired, but upon deploying to tomcat 8, those methods fail. I must be doing something wrong in my code that I haven't run across. I run the following test code in the webapp, and get the exception: @Autowired private SomeService svc; @Autowired private SomeBean bean; @ResponseBody public String method(@RequestParam String str) { return svc.run(str); } org.springframework.beans.factory.UnsatisfiedDependencyException: Error creating bean with name'someController' defined in class path resource [com/myorg/app/config/webConfig.class]: Unsatisfied dependency expressed through method'method' parameter 0; nested exception is org.springframework.beans.factory.UnsatisfiedDependencyException: Error creating bean with name'someService': Unsatisfied dependency expressed through field 'bean'; nested exception is org.springframework.beans.factory.NoSuchBeanDefinitionException: No qualifying bean of type 'com.myorg.app.services.SomeBean' available: expected at least 1 bean which qualifies as autowire candidate. Dependency annotations: {} That exception is given when trying to autowire the service bean, and the services bean has been autowired as a bean. One work around would be to just explicitly inject the service bean into the controller, and then call the method. But I am trying to understand how this should work. A: The @Autowired annotation is just a syntactic shorthand for @Resource. The @Resource annotation is a meta-annotation that is basically an alias of the @Autowired annotation, but it can also be applied to fields. The @Resource is used to pull in a field from the class and to call a setter method to set a field. But if you use the @Resource annotation, Spring by default wires in all the other auto-wired fields too. This allows you to get rid of the usual annotations and let Spring handle them. So if you do not need to manage other @Resource-ed fields in your code
